Biography: work from an interpersonal frame of reference and use a variety of techniques including cognitive behavioral approaches in my work with adult individuals and with couples. I work with clients in identifying and changing patterns in their lives that no longer work for them in an effort to help them achieve greater happiness, peace, and balance in their professional and personal lives. I believe in people's ability to change and take charge of their own lives. The therapy relationship not only provides objective reflection and a sounding board for issues, but itself can be healing as clients become more aware of how they operate in relationships and explore healthier ways of connecting. Trained in Internal Family Systems (IFS) through Level 3, and Acceptance and Commitment Therapy (ACT).

448 S. Marengo Avenue Pasadena, CA 91101 Website: drmiyaerickson.com	Phone: 626-566-7789 Email: drmiyaerickson@icloud.com
Biography: The pace of life is fast and it can feel increasingly hard to balance all of life's demands. Therefore, it's important to feel like you are investing your limited time and resources in someone that you trust in that can provide you insight, guidance and tools for change. Many times, the methods of coping that used to work in the past may no longer feel like they are working for you now. I strive to help you to identify your triggers, self-sabotaging behaviors, and untapped areas of strength. I have experience working with Caltech students and understand many of the academic and social struggles and adjustment during this pivotal time in your life. My specialties include helping to cope with life transitions, anxiety, depression, work-life balance, social skills training, cross-cultural issues, parent relationship conflicts, and partner relationship issues. I welcome working with undergraduate students, graduate students, couples, and women's groups.

Biography: Thank you for reviewing my profile. I started my career working at a private psychiatric hospital and worked with many clients in extreme situations. It was during this time that I studied DBT as a new therapy to help troubled clients. I transitioned to the eating disorder unit and was eventually offered the directorship which I gladly accepted. I was able to build up a private practice in Pasadena and left the hospital a few years back in order to focus on my practice. I enjoy my work, and while I certainly am still challenged by my clients, it is always a joy to meet the challenge and help each other grow in the desired direction.

Biography: Even among the brightest minds, it is not uncommon to experience anxiety or sadness at some point during undergraduate or graduate education, which may result in difficulty achieving our goals. My approach to therapy involves coming alongside you to provide support as we explore what obstacles might be preventing you from thriving, which may include stress, challenging advisors/professors, interpersonal difficulties, transitions, or attention (AD/HD) and learning difficulties. We will work together using your strengths to address these barriers to develop skills necessary to thrive. Also, having completed a neuropsychology post-doctoral research fellowship at City of Hope, I am uniquely aware of the numerous variables involved in research that are often out of our control. In addition, I also conduct psychological and cognitive evaluations to identify your strengths and any potential barriers to your success, such as attention and learning disabilities or psychiatric symptoms. I will then provide recommendations as to how you can address these barriers (i.e., academic accommodations), so you can reach your full potential. Please contact me to inquire further about how I can help you reach your goals.
